FIELDING "BUTTED IN."

How an Amateur Wireless Operator Got Into Naval Service.

It was a queer way by which young Charles F. Fielding of Newport got into the United States navy. A few weeks ago Fielding was drawing $14 a month as a telegraph messenger boy. Now he gets $35 a month and his board and is taking a course at the navy wireless telegraph school at the Brooklyn navy yard. It all came about because Fielding was curious as to the workings of the naval wireless telegraphy plant at the Newport torpedo station and undertook to operate a

The neident was called to the attention of the commander of the station, who looked into the matter, found that Fielding had shown remarkable knowledge of the subject for a boy of sixteen and filed a description of his apparatus at Washington. As a result of the interest taken by the commander in his work he is now in the navy.

The commander desired to encourage so enterprising a youth, but a suspicion is entertained that he was not sorry to have him leave Newport, where his work and that of other amateur wireless operators have seriously interfered with the operation of the expensive plant of the government station. Eight or nine other lads who have the wireless fever have rigged up "stations" in attics or outbuildings, stuck up poles and prepared to listen messages or even transmit them.
